

SOMETIMES, ALL IT TAKES IS ONE DAY TO CHANGE EVERYTHING.

That One Day

A SHORT STORY

THAT ONE DAY

A SHORT STORY BY

ahona

A day full of chaos, embarrassment, laughter,
and a password that changed everything.

BY ahona

THAT ONE DAY

THAT ONE DAY

THAT ONE DAY

-----AHONA

THAT ONE DAY

Copyright © 2026 Ahona

All rights reserved.

ISBN:

THAT ONE DAY

DEDICATION

I hereby declare that this short love story titled “Sei Ek Din (That One Day)” is my original work. The story, characters, and events described in this piece are purely fictional and created from my own imagination. Any resemblance to real persons, living or dead, or actual events is purely coincidental.

This work has not been copied from any other source and is written with the intention of expressing emotions, creativity, and storytelling.

Author: Ahona

THAT ONE DAY

CONTENTS

Acknowledgments	i
1 The first glance	1
2 Morning glance	5
3 The rooftop incident	9
4 I love you	13
5 Wifi connected	15
About the story	17
About author	18

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I would like to express my sincere gratitude to everyone who inspired me to write this story, “Sei Eke Din (That One Day)”. This story is not just a piece of fiction, but a reflection of emotions, memories, and moments that often remain unspoken.

I am especially thankful to the people around me—friends, experiences, and silent feelings—that unknowingly shaped this story and gave it depth. Every emotion written here carries a part of reality blended with imagination.

I would also like to thank myself for having the courage to express these feelings through words and give life to a story that means so much to me. Lastly, I thank the readers for taking the time to go through this work. I hope this story connects with your heart in some way and leaves behind a feeling you won’t forget.

— Ahona

THAT ONE DAY

1 THE FIRST GLANCE

The first time I ever had a crush in my life happened so suddenly that even now, when I think about it, I still feel embarrassed enough to hide under a blanket forever.

A new family had moved into the house next door. For three whole days, Mom kept talking about them.

“They seem decent.”

“The aunty talks very politely.”

“The son studies in college.”

As if I cared.

At least that’s what I told myself.

That afternoon, I had just finished bathing and was walking around the room while singing horribly off-key. I was in the middle of creating my own tragic song when Mom shouted from the living room.

“Choya! Come here!”

Mom calls me every five minutes.

If I eat—she calls. If I sleep—she calls. If I breathe too peacefully—she probably calls.

So I didn’t even think properly. I just rolled my eyes and walked straight into the living room.

Without my scarf.

And then—

I froze.

A woman and a boy were sitting on the sofa.

THAT ONE DAY

And both of them were staring at me.

For a moment, my soul left my body.

I wished the floor would crack open so I could disappear forever.

Instead, I did the only thing possible.

I ran.

Straight back into my room.

I could literally hear my own heartbeat.

“Oh Allah... oh Allah... why am I alive?”

I pressed both hands against my burning cheeks.

Outside, Mom shouted again,

“Choya! Come out properly!”

This time I wore my scarf like the world’s most innocent girl and stepped outside with fake dignity.

“Give salaam,” Mom ordered.

“Assalamu Alaikum,” I said softly.

But before I could even finish, my eyes automatically shifted toward him.

And that was my biggest mistake.

Because the moment I looked at him properly...

I forgot how to behave like a normal human being.

His cheeks were slightly red. His hair was messy. And his face looked so soft that my brain completely stopped functioning.

Without thinking, I blurted out,

“Aunty... did someone hit him?”

Silence.

The boy looked at me like I was mentally unstable.

His mother blinked.

THAT ONE DAY

Mom almost died.

“Why?” the aunty asked, trying not to laugh.

“His cheeks are so red,” I replied honestly. “Like cherries.”

At that exact moment, I realized my own cheeks had also become cherries.

Wonderful.

What a great first impression.

THAT ONE DAY

2 MORNING GLANCE

After that day, my life developed a schedule.

Not because of school.

Because of him.

My school started at eight. His college started at nine. And every morning around 8:30, he would leave the house.

Which meant every morning around 8:29, I would suddenly become extremely interested in standing near our front door.

I would pretend to adjust my bag. Pretend to wear my shoes. Pretend to look outside casually.

Meanwhile my eyes stayed glued to the glass door.

Waiting.

Mom would yell from inside,

“Are you going to school or opening a shop there?”

“I’m leaving!”

And then finally—

The door next door would open.

My heartbeat would instantly become illegal.

He would step outside quietly, fixing his watch or adjusting his bag.

And right at that exact moment, I would also open my own door.

Eye contact.

Just for a second.

But to me?

That one second felt longer than an entire movie.

He would look at me once, then immediately lower his eyes.

THAT ONE DAY

That tiny action alone was enough to ruin my entire day beautifully.

Sometimes, during class, I would suddenly remember the way he looked away after eye contact and start smiling at my notebook like a complete idiot.

My friends thought I had finally lost my mind.

Maybe I had.

One day my best friend asked suspiciously,

“Why do you suddenly care so much about reaching school on time?”

I immediately lied.

“Education is important.”

She stared at me for a full ten seconds before bursting out laughing.

“Who is he?”

I almost choked on air.

“There is no ‘he.’”

“Then why are your cheeks red?”

That day I spent the entire lunch break denying things nobody had even confirmed yet.

Then he would ride away on his bicycle.

And I would stand there dramatically calling for a rickshaw while internally behaving like a rejected Bollywood heroine.

“Hey, empty rickshaw...”

Empty.

Just like my heart.

Sometimes I even imagined stupid things.

Like accidentally falling from the stairs and him catching me.

Or getting attacked by street dogs so he could save me heroically.

Or suddenly topping my class so he would be impressed.

None of those things happened.

Instead, real life happened.

And real life’s name was Mom.

One day she suspiciously told Dad,

THAT ONE DAY

“Go check her school timing someday. Recently she leaves around 8:30 every day.”

That was the end.

The next morning I was forced to leave at 7:30 again.

No more waiting. No more eye contact. No more accidental love stories.

For an entire week, I didn't see him.

And somehow the neighborhood itself started looking boring.

Even the mornings felt quieter.

I stopped standing near the door. I stopped pretending to fix my shoelaces. And slowly, my dramatic little routine disappeared.

But every now and then, I still accidentally looked toward his balcony.

Just in case.

Only for two seconds.

Definitely not more than that.

One evening, while watering plants, I suddenly saw him returning home from college.

For one terrifying second, our eyes met again.

I immediately bent down and pretended to be deeply interested in a flowerpot.

Unfortunately, there was no flower.

Just soil.

I stared at dirt for almost three minutes.

THAT ONE DAY

3 THE ROOFTOP INCIDENT

Friday should be a peaceful day.

But not in my life.

Mom woke me up early and handed me a mountain of dirty clothes.

Meanwhile I was having the sweetest dream of my existence.

I was getting married to him.

I had already said “Qubool.” He had said “Qubool” twice. And just before the third time, someone shouted,

“Will you wake up or should I throw water on you?”

Half asleep, I looked at Mom and accidentally replied,

“What are you saying, husband?”

Silence.

Then destruction.

To this day, I believe my ears permanently stretched from that scolding.

After washing clothes for what felt like seventeen years, Mom sent me to the rooftop.

I hated going upstairs.

Our building had five floors.

THAT ONE DAY

And I was already skinny enough to fly away in strong wind.

While climbing the stairs, I became emotional and started singing my own self-made tragic song:

“Ah, the painful ocean of life, Going upstairs to dry clothes, I can’t do this anymore...”

I was singing dramatically while hanging clothes.

Then suddenly—

I looked up.

And nearly died.

He was standing there.

Right in front of me.

For a moment I wondered if he had heard my singing.

Then I thought:

If he heard it, then fine.

A future husband should know his wife’s voice.

Obviously.

I kept pretending to work while secretly staring at him every three seconds.

Meanwhile he calmly used his phone as if my entire emotional breakdown wasn’t happening nearby.

THAT ONE DAY

At some point I realized I had been hanging the same bedsheet for almost ten minutes.

My brain had completely stopped functioning.

I even started imagining ridiculous future scenarios.

Like us drinking tea together after marriage while I secretly controlled the Wi-Fi password forever.

Or him introducing me proudly as,

“This is my wife. She emotionally blackmailed me using internet connection.”

Honestly?

I would accept that happily.

A crow flew past screaming “kaa kaa,” bringing me back to reality.

I quickly finished everything and was about to escape when he softly called from behind,

“Excuse me...”

That voice.

Not a voice.

Honey.

Pure honey.

I turned around immediately.

He walked closer and said politely,

THAT ONE DAY

“Actually, we wanted to use your Wi-Fi. Uncle said we could ask you for the password.”

At that exact moment, all my bad ideas started dancing together inside my brain.

4. I LOVE YOU

“I’ll tell you,” I said seriously.

“But you’ll have to come closer.”

He looked confused.

“Why?”

“If someone hears the password,” I whispered dramatically, “they might misunderstand.”

He blinked.

“I’m just asking for the Wi-Fi password.”

Poor innocent boy.

He had no idea what kind of disaster he was dealing with.

Finally he stepped closer.

Very close.

Close enough for my heartbeat to completely lose control.

Then I smiled sweetly and said,

“I love you.”

The boy froze.

Completely.

As if someone had connected him directly to electricity.

“What?”

I thought maybe he didn’t hear properly.

So naturally I shouted louder.

“I LOVE YOU!”

And right then—

The universe decided to destroy me.

THAT ONE DAY

Nipa Aunty walked onto the rooftop carrying wet clothes.

She heard “I LOVE YOU,” looked between us once, spun around dramatically like a movie character, and screamed,

“Oh God!”

Then she ran downstairs.

Both of us panicked.

I immediately ran downstairs too.

Because survival comes first.

5 WIFI CONNECTED

I rushed home and desperately tried changing the Wi-Fi password before the entire neighborhood collapsed.

But before I could relax—

The doorbell rang.

My soul left my body for the second time that month.

Mom opened the door.

And there they were.

His mother.

And him.

Standing together.

I wanted to disappear forever.

Mom invited them inside while I stood there dying internally.

Then he looked at me and said politely,

“The password you gave me... it’s wrong.”

Inside my head I screamed:

Why are you calling me ‘you’ so formally after I confessed my love to you?

But outside I smiled sweetly.

“Of course it’s wrong,” I replied. “You only heard half.”

Everyone stared at me.

“I only said ‘I love you.’ That part was true.”

The boy looked like even his second soul had left his body.

Mom instantly grabbed my ear.

“Are you joking with people?!”

“I didn’t finish the password!” I protested. “Nipa Auntie screamed before I could complete it!”

THAT ONE DAY

Mom twisted my ear harder.

“Then what’s the password?”

I nearly cried.

“Leave my ear! It’s—I love you Abbu!”

Finally, he typed it.

Everyone waited.

One second.

Two seconds.

Then suddenly a small smile appeared on his face.

“The Wi-Fi is connected, Aunty.”

Relief instantly filled the room.

“Alhamdulillah,” his mother said.

Everyone relaxed.

But in my mind, I said:

Saying ‘Alhamdulillah’ won’t help.

There’s no escape for your son from this girl.

Wherever he looks...

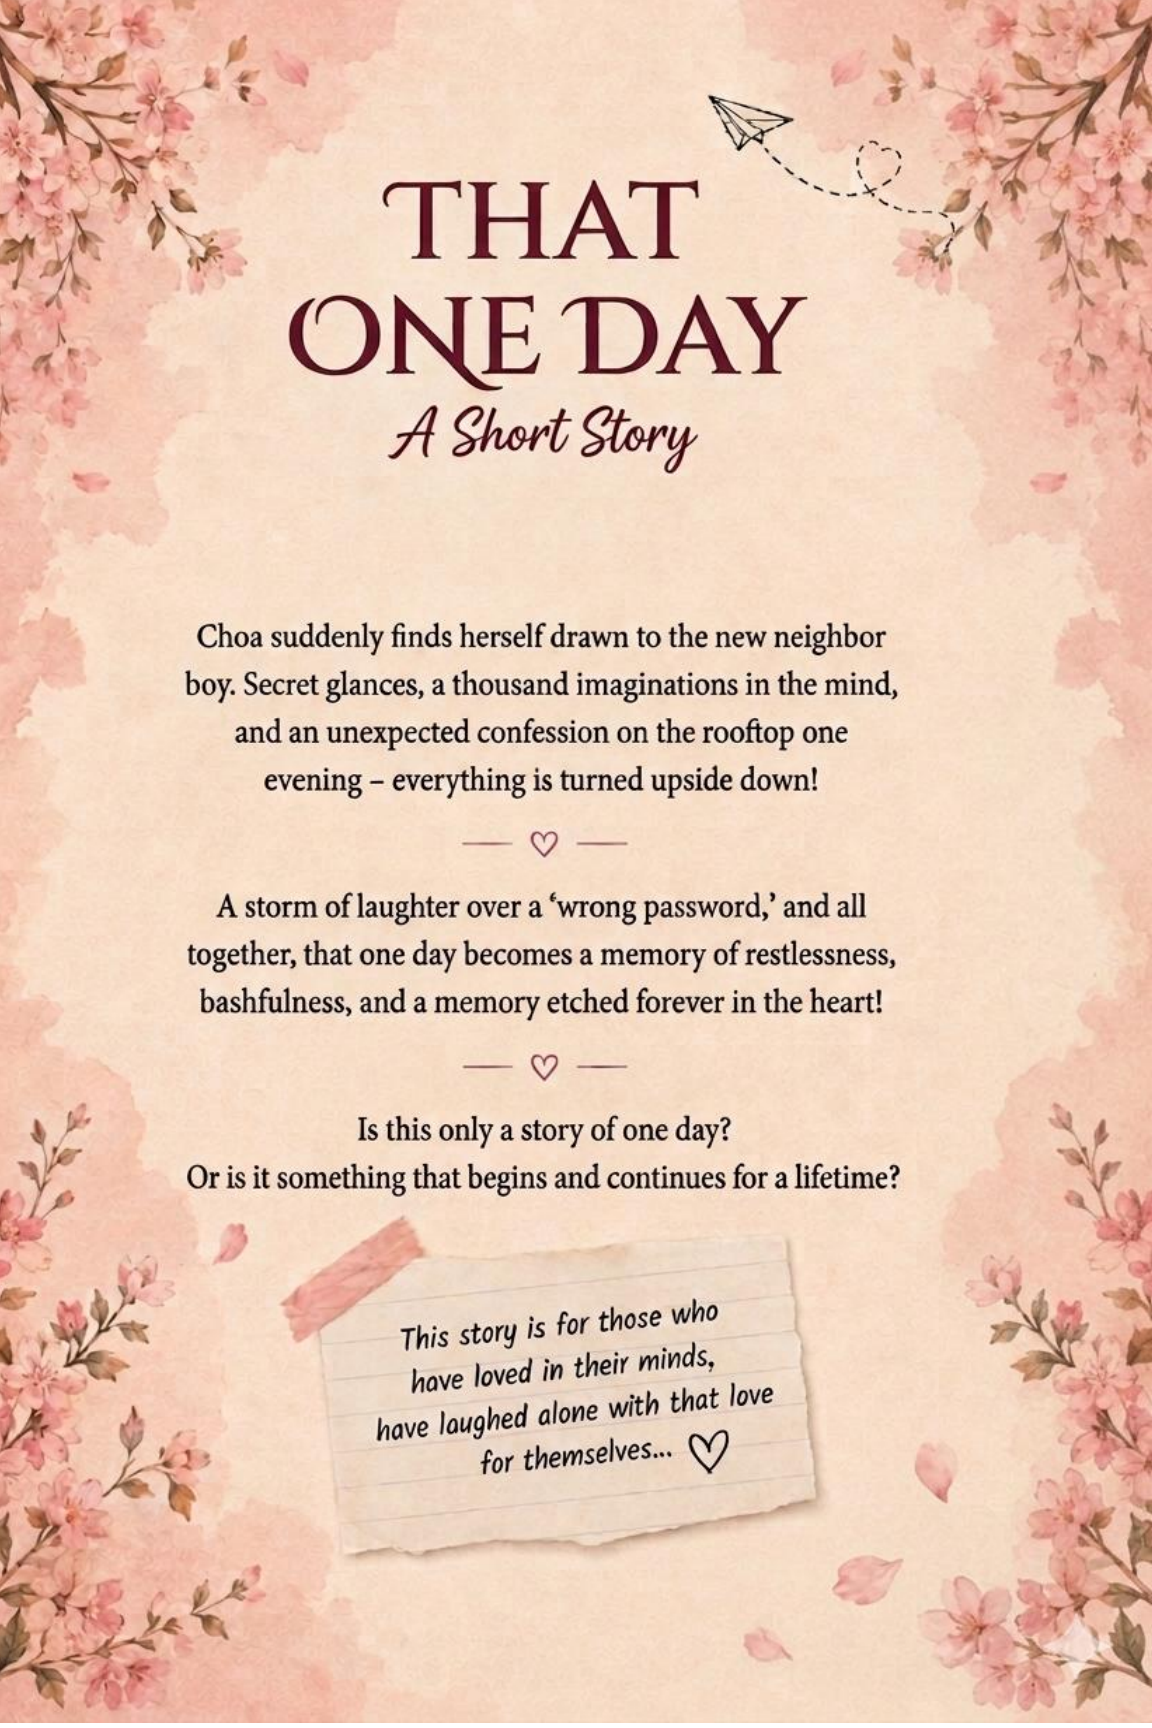

he’ll see this Choya.

ABOUT THE STORY

A COZY ROMANTIC COMEDY ABOUT AWKWARD FIRST LOVE, INNOCENT CHAOS, AND ONE UNFORGETTABLE DAY THAT CHANGED EVERYTHING.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Ahona is a passionate storyteller who loves capturing the beauty of ordinary moments through humor, emotions, and heartfelt chaos. Her writing blends innocence, comedy, and relatable emotions to create stories that feel warm, personal, and memorable. That One Day is her first romantic comedy short

THAT ONE DAY

A Short Story

Choa suddenly finds herself drawn to the new neighbor boy. Secret glances, a thousand imaginations in the mind, and an unexpected confession on the rooftop one evening – everything is turned upside down!

A storm of laughter over a 'wrong password,' and all together, that one day becomes a memory of restlessness, bashfulness, and a memory etched forever in the heart!

Is this only a story of one day?
Or is it something that begins and continues for a lifetime?

This story is for those who have loved in their minds, have laughed alone with that love for themselves... ♡